

Real Pattern and Group Agency

Abstract: Let a system count as an agent insofar as its behavior robustly displays certain real patterns, albeit in the presence of some noise. Group entities of quite familiar kinds will display agency by this Dennettian criterion. The patterns they display may emerge on the basis of member regulation but they will be nonetheless real, nonetheless robust and nonetheless relevant in drawing up an inventory of the agents that operate in social life.